It's become more and more difficult to remain vulnerable, trusting, and open to life in this era of uncertainty, global upheaval, divorce, and disrupted family life. Fortunately, many of us have friends and family members we can count on, or a relationship partner we can turn to as a safe haven where we can lay down our guard, relax, and be ourselves. But sometimes even here, things can

In a previous work, Fear of Intimacy, I wrote, "Being close to another in a loving relationship makes one aware that life is precious, but must eventually be surrendered. If we embrace life and love, we must also face death's inevitability." In particular, the experience of being loved makes one place more value on one's life, and the anticipation of its ending becomes tortuous. For ...
